Joe-All That I Am (1997).zip I had an interesting experience with Joe. I had been training him for about a week and it was going well. Then on the third day, he wouldn't walk close to me without refusing and then backing up more and more. Eventually, he got right into my face and growled at me. When we took him back to his home he would continue growling over there as well. When I tried having him walk on a leash he would back up quickly, sometimes running into the breezeway. It didn't take long before I realized that he was being controlled by something invisible to me. For some reason, I had an image of an entity with a pitchfork dragging him around the room. When this happened, I would find myself doing it as well. It was kind of comical for a while but after awhile it started to get annoying. Joe ended up getting rid of whatever was controlling him by pulling on his leash and barking at the invisible entity. Soon afterward, something came up in his dog training that made me think that this experience may have been more than just an isolated incident. He started having a problem with jumping up on people. He seemed to be attracted to females. A lady called me about a month after she had bought him from me. She was really frustrated with the jumping problem he had developed. When I asked her what she had done about it, she said that she tried having someone come over to help her but it didn't help much. Since there wasn't anyone available, I began coaching her on how to handle this situation myself via telephone so that the problem could be corrected without too much time passing. To accomplish this task, I needed to go into his obedience room and sit him down on one of the benches. Once this was done, I would begin talking to him, telling him how he had hurt her feelings by jumping on her. He was sitting there quietly on the bench, although he continued to make some noises, which I overheard as an occasional whimper. I continued talking to him about his actions and how it bothered her. I told him that if he didn't want to jump on people anymore then he needed to listen to me each time that they came by the house. I verbally corrected him each time he would jump by saying, "No." I also told him that he needed to stop doing it. He stopped for awhile but then his behavior began again. When he would jump, I would repeat the correction and each time within a short period of time we repeated the same routine over and over until we had a breakthrough. When we began working in this manner, Joe was in his place with me on the floor in front of him on one of the benches. He was down on his belly with no leash on and when people came by they were safely behind me.
